The Glass Dream Game is a divination game I developed in 2024, and practice on a daily basis. The idea came to me after reading Hermann Hesse's 1943 Nobel-Prize-Winning novel The Glass Bead Game. But the Glass Dream Game's underlying structure is ultimately owed to I Ching (The Book of Changes), an ancient Chinese divination system. The Game begins through a bibliomantic process selecting six books, by chance, from my private library of about 1,000 books. One page in each of these books is selected through the same chance process, resulting in a Hexagram. From these six pages, I take notes and makes sketches, looking for connections and noting any synchronicities emerging from the Hexagram. This process is called a Trial. Using the notes and sketches from the Trials, I compose a Dream in Movements, written passages connecting the elements across a Hexagram. From the Dream comes the Vision, a painting or object, not about the Dream, but in some way informed by it. Through the Hexagrams, Dreams, Visions, and Trials, an extensive network of relationships begin to emerge.

Underlying my interest in Hesse and I Ching is my personal involvement in Taoist practice and Jungian dream analysis.

Uncanny synchronicities between texts often have intense and surprising personal significance. I understand myself and my library to be entangled in an ongoing collaboration through which the Unconscious reveals Itself.

This approach aligns well with my longtime approach to painting. Any single painting I've made over the past decade or so, and any shown here, has perhaps four or five different paintings beneath it. Each layer I add to the work is done on temporary substrates that stick but don't bind to various areas of the surface. Sometimes some imagery remains in the final work. Other times, it appears to the viewer as non-representational or abstract. Different viewers tend to focus on different aspects or passages in a work, and therefore seem to have highly individualized encounters. Painting, for me, is a kind of iterative uncovering toward ever-deepening memory and mystery. I like believing that painting is to do with awakening, that it can be one valuable aspect of a larger contemplative or devotional practice.

Artist Biography

I value and protect my private life, which makes for a short bio, and, as nobody else is writing it, I'll use the first person. I was born in a small American military town. Art was a refuge after the childhood loss of my brother, and I believe the work still speaks to that lost moment in time. I don't hold an MFA and did not go to school for painting. In any case, school was a long time ago. What makes me happiest is being a parent to our five-year-old and a life partner to another artist. We live in the rural Southwest where I spend much of my time in the nearby mountains.
